More specifically, the present invention is related to an apparatus and method for temperature control associated with the deposition of semiconductor materials in a CVD system. Chemical Vapor Deposition (CVD) is a well-known process for forming layers or films of various materials upon semiconductor substrates such as silicon, gallium arsenide, and other related materials, wherein one or more precursors are introduced to a reaction zone containing the substrate or wafer at temperatures ranging from about 400xc2x0 C. to about 1,000xc2x0 C., and react to form a layer of the material upon the surface of the substrate. Semiconductor materials, such as copper, tungsten, titanium, platinum, aluminum, gold, silver, and their alloys are typical materials that can be deposited using a CVD process. Within the CVD process, one or more precursors are placed in a reaction zone where the precursor(s) react and/or decompose, and a select portion of the deposited material is transported to a wafer for deposition thereon. To prevent the wafer from overheating, the reaction zone is typically cooled, typically by a fan-driven cooling system. As such, the amount of time that a substrate spends in the reaction zone is directly related to the temperature thereof. Generally,
