This study was designed to test the hypothesis that low- and high-intensity weight lifting respectively, would lead to alterations of the musculoskeletal system and changes of blood pressure. Thirty-eight students (20 males and 18 females) were randomly assigned to a weight lifting group and an endurance training group (control group). There were 16 women and 12 men in the weight lifting group and 10 women and 10 men in the control group. After 4 months of training, we examined muscle mass of upper- and lower-extremities and of trunk, fat content of abdominal region, thigh muscle strength by 1 repetition maximum test, and arterial blood pressure. Anthropometrics and blood pressure were measured at the beginning and the end of the study. Significant differences in the upper- and lower-extremity muscle mass and body fat content were observed between the weight lifting and control groups. There were no significant differences in the thigh muscle strength, arterial blood pressure and abdominal fat content between two groups. Our data demonstrated that weight lifting induced beneficial effects on muscle mass and body fat content, and had no significant effect on the thigh muscle strength, arterial blood pressure and abdominal fat content.This is a gorgeous example of the educational custom living doll.
