Index A Accessories ADM-214 Access Points Access Provider ADPCM Access Point: Fixed Accoding to the ITU-T recommendations, the ISP industry has one of the most polarized definitions of the word "access point". In fact, there are a variety of opinions as to what these points will be used for and how many users they will be serving. Generally, access points are considered to be the points that are fixed to the telephone network where the user has to pay for the access. The second point in this classification is a portable access point (PAP) and it is also known as an access point mobile (APM). Mobile refers to the mobility of the phone that can be carried with the user and the provider as the user moves about the network. The third point in this set of definitions is a portable access station (PAS). This is similar to the definition of a PAP with the exception that the portable access station is normally connected to the phone line through the phone itself rather than a separate piece of equipment. The fourth point in this classification is a switched access point (SAP). Switched refers to the fact that the access point is connected to an information system through a switch rather than
