Can u Help Me?The majority of the world's population lives in coastal areas, and most coastal cities depend on water resources that flow to and from the ocean.

Many coastal areas in China and the world at large could face water shortages as a result of climate change. China's water crisis is an all too real problem, and despite its recent progress, increasing its freshwater supplies by 15 percent is just not enough for many parts of China. This coupled with increasing population and changing weather patterns all but guarantees that China's current water problems will only worsen in the future. Read: The future of the world's largest factory To address this looming water crisis, China is finding ways to increase the amount of water it can pull from the ground. According to a recent article published in Nature, over the past several decades researchers have made strides in increasing the efficiency of seawater desalination, and China's government is now looking to move in the same direction. These saltwater desalination plants rely on a process called reverse osmosis, or RO. Simply put, RO involves pushing water through a membrane that has a very small pore size. Only certain molecules will be able to cross the membrane, and of those only water molecules. All other particles — including salt ions — are left behind and purified water is obtained. Some of the most important are financial: it is expensive to construct and maintain, and because of the large amount of energy it requires, it is not always the most energy-efficient way to produce drinking water. Additionally, the process does not work
