Field of the Invention The present invention relates to apparatus for sorting mail at a postal distribution center, and more particularly to apparatus for sorting mail into large bins and small bins. 2. Description of the Related Art A major problem which arises at a postal distribution center or in a network of such postal distribution centers is that of efficiently sorting mail so that it may be stored in a manner which will make subsequent handling more convenient. There are several types of sorting apparatus for use in postal distribution centers. One type of sorting apparatus is a large bin sort. With such apparatus, mail items are brought to a series of large bins or conveyors which allow the mail items to be deposited into an appropriate bin by exerting a downward force on the mail items. Because of its high throughput and consequently low labor cost, large bin sorting is very desirable. However, large bin sorting presents some drawbacks which are inherent with the large bins. The large bins are usually five cubic feet in size, requiring a large space and causing considerable breakage to mail items. In addition, the large bins can only receive a limited number of mail items. For example, a large bin may receive only 2,200 mail items in one shift. Consequently, in order to achieve sorting efficiencies greater than about 96%, larger bins are required in order to store an acceptable portion of the mail being received. A further drawback of large bins is that, because they receive a number of mail items (i.e., 2,200), it is difficult to ensure that mail items of substantially identical characteristics are mixed. For example, if a return letter were to be received by a large bin, and a package mailing were to be received by a large bin,

What is a Credit Card Balance? A credit card is a tool that lenders use to extend business credit and facilitate access to its currency. At the same time, it can also make it difficult for the consumer to maintain a positive balance at a level deemed acceptable by the provider. You, the consumer, must make regular payments to your lender, which you will be charged interest for. This can make the process of building a credit history frustrating for a person with a poor credit history, who has been unable to obtain a loan. A credit card balance can be defined as the total balance on a credit card. It should not be confused with the credit limit, the amount of credit you have been given by your lender. A card with a low credit limit may be accepted by other financial institutions when used with funds available through other sources. Although a card with a low credit limit does not appear to have a high credit card balance, it may be subject to a high yearly percentage rate on a revolving credit line. Another explanation of a credit card balance is the charge that will be added to a credit card account on a monthly basis. This is different from an introductory offer, which is normally granted during a promotional period and is offered at a discounted rate. When you do not pay your credit card bill on time, the credit card company will charge interest to your account at a rate of around the prime rate. Depending on the amount of interest charged and the length of time for which it is charged, your credit card balance can increase. In this case, you may need to obtain financing to pay off the credit card bill or find another way of covering the remaining balance. Your credit card company may not allow your balance to exceed a certain amount. If your credit card account exceeds this limit, your credit card provider will close your account. The closure of your account will not result in a negative mark against your credit rating.The Cartographers' Guild is a forum created by and for map makers and aficionados, a place where every aspect of cartography can be admired, examined, learned, and discussed.
