This study was conducted to ascertain the potential role of neuropeptides and serotonin in the development of cutaneous vasculitis in neuroblastoma (NB)-bearing mice. The effects of NB on (1) cutaneous blood flow, (2) the number of mast cells and (3) the vasoactive neuropeptides were investigated in this study. The results indicated that (1) a significant increase in blood flow was observed following the implantation of NB cells and that the vasoconstrictor response to nerve stimulation was significantly depressed in NB-bearing mice as compared with control mice. (2) Compared with controls, the number of mast cells in NB-bearing mice was increased, especially in the dermis, while their releasability of serotonin was also remarkably increased. (3) The levels of substance P and calcitonin gene-related peptide (CGRP) released in vivo following nerve stimulation of the uninvolved hind paw skin of NB-bearing mice were dramatically elevated, as compared with controls, whereas the level of CGRP released in response to exogenous capsaicin was found to be increased only slightly in NB-bearing mice. The results suggest that the overrelease of CGRP is a major contributor to the increase in vascular permeability and the demyelination of NB-bearing mice.La seconda futura critica del Pd al Travesti che sbatte sempre alle larghezza.
