(From 4 to 1000) I've started learning data structures and algorithms this past week and I'm stuck on this exercise in particular: Write an algorithm to calculate the sum of the reciprocals of the first k natural numbers. (From 4 to 1000) Any help/ideas? I'm really stuck here. My first thought is to do it recursively or just brute force but I really have no clue on how to approach this. A: This can be done in a recursive way. #include #include #include unsigned int sumReciprocals(unsigned int k) { const unsigned int n = 1000; std::vector v(n); for (unsigned int i = 0; i

Random-access memory (RAM) is typically used as computer data storage. A RAM device is a device that can store information or data in an addressable memory location. Dynamic random-access memory (DRAM) is a type of RAM that stores its data in a dynamic, rather than a static, memory cell. Because it is dynamic, the data stored in a memory location can be read from and altered without the need to refresh the memory location. There are many types of DRAM devices, with different capacities and characteristics. Memory devices include memory arrays of memory cells that are each capable of storing digital information in the form of a logic level. The memory devices may store logic 0, logic 1, or a combination of the two. One conventional type of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) device includes two transistors in each memory cell. Another type of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) device includes four transistors in each memory cell. Other DRAM devices, such as NDRAM and VDRAM devices, are also available. Dynamic random access memory (DRAM) devices are used in various electronic devices, including portable and desktop computers. Examples of some DRAM devices are shown in FIG. 1A and FIG. 1B. DRAM devices commonly include memory cells that are arranged in a matrix of rows and columns. The rows are selected for reading or writing through the use of a row decoder. The bit lines of the DRAM device are paired with column selection devices, such as NAND gates and NOR gates. To read from or write to a memory cell, a word line is actuated, which enables the actuation of the column select lines. Each memory cell in the DRAM device has a storage capacitor that stores a logic level indicative of the presence or absence of a logic level within the memory cell. Each memory cell also includes a transistor for detecting and amplifying charge stored on the storage capacitor.
