But for when he was sixteen, when he was an adult. And yet. He was good. He was decent. Well, okay, not brilliant, but there were moments—like, oh, I'll never forget when he and his team beat the world's best team of the week in a world cup qualifying match and they did it in seventeen minutes—when he went into MVP-mode. He could almost do anything, and whenever he put his mind to it and when he played in a moment like that, on a world stage, he could do anything. That shit was insane, and he was fully aware of how much he was capable of, and that he could take it and just flat out dominate it. The only things he couldn't do was fucking run, and he couldn't do that either. What's more, he couldn't jump either. "You're as gifted as any of them," his father told him. "It's just that you're not quite as quick or agile. That's why, when you're playing, when you're trying to make a tackle or do something like that, you keep missing and you get hit, you get injured. You need to concentrate." "Like you said," Frank said, "it's not a gift. It's hard work." "Maybe so," his father said. "But I expect you to work at it." Frank knew what that meant. That didn't mean
