We collected data on tinnitus characteristics and functional impact of tinnitus in 49 children who presented to a tertiary care center for tinnitus and 10 of their caregivers. Forty-one percent of children presented with a first episode of tinnitus, 59% of tinnitus was continuous, and 86% experienced intermittent tinnitus. First-episode tinnitus was associated with the "filling in" of speech sounds, lack of a tinnitus masker, and presence of nonpulsatile tinnitus. Tinnitus was associated with sleep disturbance in 68% of cases, disruption of daily activities in 61%, and learning issues in 59%. Headaches were reported by 22% of children. Children with tinnitus complaints presented with significantly more functional impacts than did children without tinnitus complaints. Caregiver support is essential for the successful management of pediatric tinnitus.Characterization of a hERG channel in the rat mesentery. The hERG K(+) channel is widely expressed in the heart. Its function is thought to be important in cardiac arrhythmias. However, the role of the hERG channel in non-excitabile cells, such as the intestine, is not well known. This study identified a hERG-like current in rat mesentery smooth muscle cells and characterized its pharmacological and molecular properties. Whole-cell patch-clamp recordings were used to identify a hERG channel in rat mesentery smooth muscle cells. A functional hERG channel was co-expressed with a cloned rhodopsin kinase (a marker of hERG trafficking) in hERG-negative NIH 3T3 fibroblasts. Current recording in NIH 3T3/hERG/cloned rhodopsin kinase cells showed large amplitude inward currents with the characteristic time course and voltage dependence of an hERG current. 10 $\mu\text{mol/L}$ E-4031 and 10 $\mu\text{mol/L}$ ICA
