Listeria monocytogenes in raw milk: is it a cause of fever of unknown origin? Fever of unknown origin (FUO) is an uncommon infectious disease. The causative agent is not identified in approximately 30% of cases. In this context, the significance of Listeria monocytogenes in FUO is not well established. To explore the role of L. monocytogenes in FUO, we performed a retrospective analysis of the microbiological records of 962 patients with a FUO. L. monocytogenes was isolated in 47 patients

(4.9%). The median age of patients with L. monocytogenes-positive FUO was 35 years. The clinical presentation was rather unspecific. L. monocytogenes-positive patients had higher mean platelet counts (390,000 versus 244,000 cells/ μ l) and leukocyte counts (9,800 versus 5,400 cells/ μ l) than patients with L. monocytogenes-negative FUO. None of the patients with L. monocytogenes-positive FUO had thrombocytopenia (#: Provider Mapping for config variable in template #: #: providers: [remove_const, config::{{.name }}] #: #: remove_const - Disable the constant check on
