getBigInt(byte[] bytes) { return ByteBuffer.wrap(bytes).order(ByteOrder.LITTLE_ENDIAN).getInt(); } } Q: Tracking currency exchange rates for a game I am making a game in which the currency conversion for the goods is influenced by the player choice. For example, the player picks the amount of gold the character will get and the currency being spent to buy the items. The character then has a chance at buying some items with this gold at a chance of 200%. The chance is determined by a random number between 50 and 999. The player sees the objects he can buy and a currency price. The currency is drawn from a random number between the user selected gold amount, and a random number between 50 and 999. I am currently using a Google spreadsheet to keep track of the prices. That spreadsheet has currency conversion rate data for many different currencies and I am stuck on whether to use that data or if I should calculate it on my own. The way I am calculating the currency conversion right now, if I convert $1 to EUR and $1 USD, the list of items I can get are multiplied with the exchange rate given in the spreadsheet I am using. The sum of the multiplication is then divided by the first amount. So if the player uses $100 USD (assuming the currency list as done above), they get all the items that would cost 200% of $100 USD or $200 EUR, plus some more. If the currency list says the USD is worth 50 EUR, the result is $100, the USD value is 5000. What is
