Healthcare workers are at high risk for developing mental disorders, such as depression and anxiety disorders, as well as burnout, which leads to chronic stress and eventually negatively affect their work. Considering the low level of knowledge about the prevalence of mental health problems in this population and the difficulties of the healthcare professionals to get access to routine mental health services and use of specialized healthcare, the purpose of this study was to evaluate the extent of psychological distress in a population of healthcare workers in a general hospital, to measure their knowledge of this problem, and to establish the prevalence of these disorders. A survey of psychological distress of healthcare professionals was conducted through self-administered questionnaires applied to a cross-sectional sample of healthcare workers in five different units. We evaluated the mental disorders of the patients attended in an emergency room of a public general hospital in Mexico City in the period from January 2001 to April 2002. We found that 65% were women; 63% came for visits due to "common" problems; 81% had a confirmed diagnosis of some type of psychiatric illness, and 36% of the cases needed treatment. The main diagnosis was depressive disorder, which was more common in women and among the elderly. Patients suffering from affective disorders frequently received psychopharmacological treatment, while those with anxiety disorders received psychotherapeutic treatment. We conclude that, although a little more work needs to be done, emergency departments can also be important mental health centres. This also seems to be true in developing countries, in which a referral system to specialised institutions is often lacking. .0L, .0L.
