(juu The Engineering of an E30 M3s Side Skid Stacker [I'm going to be super-dense today and try to cover as much ground as possible, hopefully you enjoy it as much as I've enjoyed compiling the information thus far. Of course, the bar here is to become a multi-vehicle writer. One vehicle is all I've had the pleasure of being inside of, one is all I ever wanted to learn about and the last one, well, this was important to me too.] The engineered side skid has been the focus of much of the criticism I've seen since the release of the car. That criticism is mainly against the fact that you can't remove or install your planks safely. Well, unless you have the $$$$ to buy the E30M3 kit, chances are you'll never be able to. All that aside, the engineering of the side skid worked out rather well from my observations. The M3s side skid obviously has a different geometry than the E30 and the difference in geometry is immediately apparent. The M3s side skid is longer, a lot longer, than the side skid of the E30. Obviously, this is another thing that you can't do with the standard E30 side skid or the OEM side skid from the E30X5. The side skid is secured with three bolts, two in the center cross member and one on either end. It's a very straightforward engineering decision that is made to allow for easy vehicle recovery and easy removal. We can dispute the appropriateness of those decisions in the morning, but for now, they are what they are. The planks of the side skid are secured with a tube - a tube that we can't remove. When the siding is removed, the tube will be removed. This is simply a matter of preventing a lot of torque in the tube, therefore making the splitter inoperable without outright destruction of the tube. Since we can't remove the tube from the side skid, we will have to calculate the size of the tube needed to secure the planks to the side skid from the outside diameter of the tube. Consider this line: Let X be the diameter of the tube, Y the width of the slit, and Z the height of the slit. This would be the tube we're securing to the side skid 648931e174
