Two-photon autofluorescence imaging of the spinal cord in rats: a tool for functional imaging of glial cells? Two-photon microscopy of intrinsic fluorophores has recently been used to image individual cells in the central nervous system, with clearly visible microglia and astrocytes. Since these cells can be simultaneously activated and labelled, we hypothesized that the technique could be used to assess changes in function of glial cells in the spinal cord after nerve injury. We carried out spinal cord transection in rats and compared the motor behavior of these animals to a control group, using the treadmill method. We then used two-photon autofluorescence imaging of the spinal cord to identify the activated microglia and astrocytes. We found increased levels of pimonidazole, a marker of hypoxia, and GFAP, an astrocyte marker, in the spinal cord of transected animals. Microglia, identified by their typical morphology, were shown to be most fluorescent in the laminae I and II at the level of the lesion. Microglia were only increased at days 3 and 7 in transected animals, and were unchanged in the control group. These results indicate that the technique can be used to assess activated microglia in vivo. Glial cells are of interest in neuropathic pain, where we propose that they contribute to changes in function after nerve injury. Police are investigating after a man was badly beaten in Brampton.
