I have this code: def bla(x): print(x2) def simple(): print(bla(1)) I'd like to swap the function output with a standard output, so that in this case the simple() function would return 1 if I leave the last input parameter as x = 1. I've tried doing just that with a set and a string but it's still returning me the real value of bla(1). I would need an elegant way to handle this, any help would be appreciated! A: I don't know what you mean by "swap the function output with a standard output" but you could define a class method and use a special argument to call the method with. def simple(x): return call_with_x(bla, x) def call_with_x(f, x): return f(x) You could also use functools.partial. Edit (thanks to @JonClements) A bit more of a pythonic approach, you could define a class that wraps up the function and replaces its behavior as you desire: class Wrapper: def __init
