Media playback is unsupported on your device Media caption Sir Kevin Tebbit: "We've over-elaborated the ridiculous" Tim Farron has urged the prime minister to give his thoughts to "real people" in the wake of his call for gay people to be barred from the armed forces. Sir Kevin Tebbit said his "irrefutable" case for lifting the ban was rooted in "equality". Writing for the Daily Telegraph, the former army officer said it would be "irresponsible" to stick with "that odd mixture of big-heartedness and naivety that so often characterises our political discourse". Sir Kevin joins other senior Conservative MPs in backing Mr Johnson's plans. The prime minister has already pledged to lift the ban, but has been under pressure to explain how lifting it would benefit the armed forces. He was also accused of "playing to the gallery" by announcing the change in the Conservative Party's 2017 election manifesto, and a poll taken before the Tories changed their policy found 66% of voters opposed the move. But the PM set out his reasoning in a live broadcast on the Andrew Marr Show on Sunday, saying he believed scrapping the ban would "bring people together". Speaking on BBC One's Sunday Politics, Sir Kevin - who is president of the Campaign for Armed Forces Equality (CaFE) - said: "We need to be honest, we've over-elaborated the ridiculous in trying to maintain something that in fact there is no case for.
