I am using React for the first time. I have a parent component that renders a child component, and the parent component has its state bound to the child components state. So when the user clicks on a button the state of the parent component changes and the child component shows up. What is the appropriate way to handle this? What would I make the change to the child component to tell React that the parent component needs to be re-rendered? My first thought is that I could just throw in a state property in the child component and have its setter function called whenever the parent component renders. Would that be appropriate? I'm trying to keep my code as clean as possible, so it would be nice if I could use props or use a separate layer of abstraction to handle this. My question is this: What is the appropriate way to handle this? UPDATE: I need the solution to this so I am building an app in WordPress and don't want to use some library such as Redux, Flux or MobX. A: would that be appropriate? No, it won't be appropriate. A parent component usually manages a collection of child component. Let's say you have a List component that renders a number of Listitem components. You would
