By Matthew Chase Jan 4, 2014 in Technology The U.S. Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has subpoenaed documents related to Google's plan to restore internet service to Puerto Rico. Google said it will begin disconnecting internet service for Puerto Rico on Jan. 11. Google said it will also remove AdWords links to Puerto Rican search results. Google said it has not been asked to provide information to the government on searches being done from other U.S. territories, including U.S. territories that have not been declared as disasters. Puerto Rico was already offline for at least a week, making it harder for Google to find out what information people were searching for and which companies could be providing ads against those searches. Google said it is giving people 30 days to download their content to a computer, safe computer, or the cloud, and that it will restore online search. A new website has been established for those looking for help: tpr.gov. Google said It said, This is the first of many steps we'll take to help as the reconstruction effort in Puerto Rico continues. The company says it is actively testing solutions for localizing its services and will continue to provide updates and help as more information is known.
