[direct_download][download_link][download_download] @Q: What are the benefits of using a repository on a project in the beginning instead of just accessing the data directly? I am wondering what are the benefits of creating repositories instead of directly accessing the data?
Thank you A: A repository abstracts access to the database, allowing you to change the implementation without needing to recompile any application code. If you had no repository abstraction, if you had something like this: using (var context = new MyContext()) { var customer = context.Customers.Single(c => c.ID == 1234); } If you wanted to switch the implementation of context to a new-fangled SQL Server store, you'd have to write code to manipulate the SQL. This not only makes your code harder to read, it also makes it harder to change. By using a repository interface, you can add a new repository interface which adds generic support for whatever database store you want, and you can also add code that does more complex queries or formatting of data without requiring recompilation of your own code. Main menu Fifty years of reading and writing Main menu On the list April 24, 2010 One of the ongoing projects of the 2009 Recession Festival at the High Line was presenting some of the best and most essential writing on the early years of the recession at the Library's Rizzoli US Books for Writers Collection. This week's offering was a brilliant meditation on the human aspects of the crisis by Pulitzer Prize-winner and former New York Times columnist Thomas L. Friedman, whose new book, Hot, Flat, and Crowded: Why We Need a Green Revolution-and How It Can Renew America, was published to widespread acclaim in March. Friedman's great strength is as an observer and chronicler of the world's politics and economics. He is a master of artful repetition and the most skilled at distilling out the complex and the core of a given issue. This is his fourth best-selling book, and the most recent in which he has tackled the global economic crisis. Hot, Flat, and Crowded captures something of that underlying complexity, but also what Friedman sees as the key to a sustainable recovery: harnessing the green revolution (the greening of the world economy) to the development of American jobs. c6a93da74d
