The captain, Mohamed Attouallah Mohamed Sultan, stepped down three times to address the problem, which started with a delay of 15 minutes and was then worsened by subsequent air-traffic control instructions that ordered the crew to climb to 35,000 feet. Eventually, however, a series of clearances allowed the aircraft to descend to a level friendly to the crew. "I couldn't understand why the flight was closed," said Sultan, after the landing. "I didn't know what to do. The flight time was 70,000. I had to return to London to refuel and land in Heathrow. I couldn't understand why we were left on the ground for so long. I was trying to communicate with the tower and everyone was saying: 'Close the flight, close the flight,' and they didn't tell me why. "I was a bit lost. But I just shut down and watched television. I heard about the second crash [of 787 Dreamliners] and I was thinking, 'Those are all accidents.' I was frustrated. Maybe I was a little bit too impatient." The flight also produced the longest period of continuous uninterrupted air-to-ground contact ever recorded. In a statement, an Emirates spokesman said: "The flight [920] departed on
