
Abbyy Flexicapture 10 ~UPD~ Full 40

ABBYY FlexiCapture uses application-specific variables to capture the data that should be captured. For example, invoice number, total quantity, and total sum are different things than project number, project code, and project name. Depending on the business rules and policy, I can use any of them in my work.

I can create a project with project code, project name, and project number. I have the app-specific variables for invoice number, total quantity, and total sum and so that all those things are captured. At the same time, I'm able to extract the desired data in the right format. The automation I implemented, I utilized ABBYY FlexiCapture for that. It has been used in a number of complex transactions. The way we operate invoices from clients is somewhat different. For example, the invoice number contains the client's name and the invoice amount. What I did was to create a client, and then I tagged all the invoices. Then, the customer can use the client as a label. The customer can create a quote which has the client as its label. If he wants to quote an item, he just picks up a customer from the client. When we create the quote, we get the client as a field and we name it client. Then, we have one more field and that is the price field. The client automatically gets assigned to that field. When we go through a PDF, we automatically pick it up as a label for that field. We just need to have a very simple interface and the job is done. We do not need to create a human and have a human read all the invoices. Instead, we have a system that captures the invoices and spits it out. We can scale this and create a client that can be assigned to different customers.

We can then make this project generic and use the same client as a label for the quote.
