if you have a variety of discs, your media selection will differ depending on the disc. if your source disc has a different number of files than the other disc, youre done. if not, select the disc that has the extra files and change the target disc to the other disc and repeat this process. after you have all your files, you need to get them ready to convert into a readable disc image. this is where it gets a little tricky. first, you need to get your image converted. if you went through the process of converting and burning the disc a few months ago, it will be in the.d0 format. double click on the file to open it up in the program of your choice. once you open it, drag the image file over to discjuggler and click open. this should open it up to be full screen with a small sign telling you that discjuggler is now writing the disc image. just sit back and wait, and it will be finished. my first step was to convert all the files into a readable disc image. this was handled in the same manner as disc burning, just without the burning since there are no visible files. once i converted them into this format, i saved them as cdi files and then burned all of them on one discjuggler disc. imgburn can do it all. you can burn images, data, data/image mixed discs, video discs, audio discs and so on. furthermore, it can be used to convert images to data and data to images, which is useful for archiving and compressing data and images. no matter what kind of data discs your cd-image has, imgburn supports them all. it supports windows and mac format discs, cd-r, cd-rw, dvd-r and dvd-rw, cd-rw, mini, 1.6cm and 2.5cm dvd discs, and also blu-ray discs (bd-r, bd-re, and bd-25). 5ec8ef588b
