In the 1920s, people used to spend as much as half of their day at the office. While it was commonplace for offices to have a private telephone, the lines were still shared. Yet, the data generated by people working in offices was being captured by office equipment: files, facsimile machines, dictaphones, telephone-based bill paying machines, etc. It was becoming increasingly clear that something had to be done. The evolution of information technology, and the increasing acceptance of personal computing and Internet technology, created new opportunities to benefit from office data. The office (and the data generated by it) has only continued to evolve, and become more and more connected. Preferred brands include Daesus (supported in France), Asoftech Datarecovery (supported in Korea), and G-Data Recovery (supported in United Kingdom). It may be a good idea to test the recovery utility on a spare hard drive so that any defects in the utility can be immediately noted. This is especially important when recovery is performed on a main hard drive. Data Recovery Software can be found in the Help menu. WinZip Software can be found in the Help menu. The organization in which the data was created is a strong indicator of how the data has been recovered. Findings can include a naming system, authors' signatures, or Post-Office forwarding information. If you do not know the name or origin of the person or company in which the data was created, it will probably be of little help when attempting to identify the data creator. Nevertheless, if you can determine the name or origin of the creator, it can be a good idea to search for similar files. Even if the creator has lost their original name or address, you might be able to determine the name of the person in which they are currently employed. If you cannot find the creator of the data, consider that many businesses have data with the original creator's name that was issued or filed with them; if you determine who this business is, you may be able to obtain the name of the original creator.
