split/second is definitely a game where you can explore at your leisure, but the city's centrality to the game means that you'll encounter other racers even when you're not driving - and they're not the least bit friendly. It's rare to be able to venture off-course for more than a few minutes without engaging in a battle. It's also a game where you need to pay attention to your surroundings and your opponents - if a cop suddenly appears in the middle of your race, it's not just a case of waltzing around and hoping they stop, you need to make a strategic move to avoid their attention. If you're in a race, it's best not to lose sight of your target, but if a cop is chasing you, it's better to lead them on a wild goose chase than try to evade them for fear of the consequences. Part of the reason why split/second is so enjoyable to drive is that it can be played in single- or multiplayer split-screen, and the game supports local split-screen, online multiplayer, and over-the-top online racing. On top of that, there are multiple control schemes available - for example, you can use the d-pad or the shoulder buttons to control the camera angle, and you can use the touch screen to look around, making the game a very compelling option for those without a 360 controller. Online racing also has a lot of nuance, as it lets you play for money or for bragging rights, and you can choose your weapons before battle - so you're not just driving into a one-on-one slugfest. Though it can be a little tricky to establish a good connection at first - there is no 'host' option, so it's very important to wait until a match is ready to begin before starting a race, or you'll be presented with a frustrating black screen if someone else starts a race that you're waiting on. The online multiplayer is also a little wonky, with the split-screen races being delayed by a few seconds, and the online races being started by the players at different times.

The colour palettes of each city are very distinctive, and pretty much match the environments as far as architecture and gardens. However, they're not a blatant copy-paste of real-world locations. Each place looks unique and matches its namesake, which makes driving through them a rewarding experience. Real life Fairhaven has a thin, coastal strip of buildings and neighbourhoods, while sprawling, sprawling Vegas has a plethora of casinos, buildings and strip malls, and no shortage of sprawling, sprawling billboards. It's the kind of place where you'd just never think to stop and take photos. It's also one of the more colourful places in the game, with buildings and billboards taking on a bright hues of purple, blue and green. The opposite case is Las Vegas, which is mostly shades of grey and black, aside from some neon signs and billboards. Driving is clearly the main focus of this game. Not only is there one of the most comprehensive drift and spin mechanics we've seen in years, but the cars have all the characteristics you'd expect of a Ferrari. There's a natural, skilful-handling feel to every car, with plenty of grip when you need it and a floaty 'featherlight' handling model that lets you drift and turn without much weight behind your touch. The cars respond to steering inputs quickly and predictably, though there's some artificial lag in the game, and cars with superior handling can feel less responsive than others. This can be taken to extremes in free-drive, where cars can feel sluggish, while once you're embroiled in a chase they become lightning-quick. This only compounds the problem slightly, though, as you're bound to make a lot of unplanned, unintentional swerves and bangs to shake off your pursuers. 5ec8ef588b
