The new features also take advantage of what's new in the software. Adobe tells us that this year, the new HTML5 features in CS6 allow vector graphics to be used at high resolutions (4,096 x 4,096 pixels). Vector graphics are the graphics that a computer can create from a geometric construct such as straight lines. Max is giving us some hard work, and by giving us a fully interactive feature, Adobe is using what we humans can do at a high level of plate the rook. It's a good thing, and we've got our own interfaces working with vector graphics. Other new features fall under the category of being overused. This latest version is notable for another touch-up on some classic brushes and file-loss prevention. In DP5, Photoshop creates a new file format, dng, and also adds two new lossless formats from raw files, dwb and dng. Resources at Adobe tell us that dng is merely an extension to RAW, with the addition of some metadata. dwb uses some of the same architecture but does not add as much metadata. The new lossless formats are heavily touted as being better in terms of filesize and quality. Then we learn from another resource that dng is based on dwb. This means that dwb and dng are actually identical, except the latter has a bit more metadata. I find that I don't understand what's so great about dng or dwb. Even when compared to TIFF, a format I prefer, their file sizes are pretty comparable. I have a few tests I want to do to see how dwb and dng are better in their ability to store information, but for now, I figure they are simply another file format.
