Receive the latest local updates in your inbox Some local residents say they aren't happy with the recent implementation of a pilot program allowing family members to ride along with police officers on some surveillance missions. Lt. Jim Driscoll, the pilot program supervisor with the Boston Police Department, says the program, called Liaison, was approved by the City Council in 2011, but it was only recently made available to members of the public. It gives public safety officials the opportunity to share confidential information between a family member and an officer on a case-by-case basis to help the family deal with the situation. Driscoll says the program is only an option for those who have been identified as having a close relationship with the officer, and must be sought by the family member, an officer, or the family member's representative. "It's to let you know, at a moment of truth, a good time to call your loved one and check in and see how they're doing and ask them how they're doing in the process," Driscoll said. He says some people who want to ride along are worried about putting themselves in a potentially dangerous situation. "I do feel like there's a lot of fear that a person can be in a dangerous situation and be part of that while you're at the police station or being debriefed. And that's not always the case," Driscoll said. The BPD says it worked with the Boston Council on Human Relations and the City Attorney's Office to bring this option to the public.
