It seems everybody who has an interest in Windows automation has made his way to AutoHotKey. This text editor, editor, and macro recorder allow the user to record his keystrokes, and create scripts that can be run with hotkey combinations. What is AutoHotKey? You may also be familiar with AutoIt, the complete opposite of AHK, which doesn't just work on Windows, but even on Mac OS X. AutoIt is a program which lets you write scripts that run using OS-specific hotkey combinations. For example, by pressing Alt + F, you can start a file using AutoIt. Both programs are completely free, the difference being that AutoHotKey allows developers to develop their scripts without the need of using the command line. Common Examples While it is not the goal of this tutorial to detail every command which can be executed by AHK, we will show you a few practical examples. We are not dealing with expert AHK users, and with the possible exception of some command line combinations, we will not describe how to use the AHK editor. For this, we have only a few words to say. You can edit an AHK script in the editor, which is basically an AHK script - just drag and drop snippets of code between the tags. If you have not yet created a hotkey combination that you wish to use with AHK, do the following: Go to the editor Find a hotkey combination which you use frequently Create a new script in the editor Enter the hotkey combination, optionally make the hotkey combination into a new hotkey combination In addition to these, you can execute various commands as well, including opening up a web browser, installing updates, updating the system clock, and more. Let us now take a look at some practical examples. Popup Menu As simple as it may sound, this is a great example of using AHK with a little planning. Suppose we wanted to have a quick menu on a Windows desktop. The following is a snippet of code which creates a drop down menu, which can be opened with Alt + F. The script can be placed in the AHK script editor, and be run with Alt + F. This is a really nice script, but we can make it better. Suppose we do not want the menu to open as soon as we press Alt + F, but instead wait for about a second. We can

Achieving glucose control in patients with type 2 diabetes mellitus using insulin analogue regimens. Insulin analogues (insulin glulisine, insulin detemir, insulin lispro) are increasingly used in clinical practice. In this article we review the pharmacokinetics and pharmacodynamics of insulin analogues, their advantages and disadvantages, and assess the evidence for achieving glycaemic control in patients with type 2 diabetes with insulin analogue regimens, including the once-daily basal-bolus regimen.

Q: Good approaches for solving of sequence similarity I'm working with some dataset that has a huge number of sequences in which each sequence may have several similarities with other sequences. The goal is to find the most similar sequences among a huge amount of sequences. I have also looked into BLAST, BLAT and similar results, and it seems that they are good enough for this goal. I want to have a comparison between sequences that have the same protein or DNA sequences. What are the good approaches for doing this kind of comparison? I need to find out the similarity between pairs of sequences and my sequences are in FASTA format. In short I'm trying to do sequence matching using FASTA sequences. Any help is greatly appreciated.

A: In this question you can find several approaches to do that, but as for me the Q: Git command to push a commit to a remote repo I have 2 local repos, which are both remote repos on github, and I'm trying to sync them via git. To make the process easier, I have a bash script that runs every day and pushes a commit to the remotes of the repos I'm working on (and the "master" repo). Now, I'd like to accomplish the same thing in reverse. I'd like the script to pull from the remotes and commit to the local repos. Is there a git command I can run that will do this? I want to commit to a specific remote repo, not to a branch on that remote repo.

A: What you are describing is: `git pull --rebase origin master` See "
