Intravenous immunoglobulin (IVIg) is used for a variety of clinical indications, in particular immune deficiency, and has been used occasionally in the therapy of autoimmune or inflammatory disease. IVIg shows disease-modifying activity in relapsing remitting multiple sclerosis (MS) and neuromyelitis optica (NMO). Here, we describe two cases of chronic progressive demyelinating disease (CPDD), comprising two different and rare entities, Lépreux's syndrome and syndromes associated with central pontine myelin. These disorders are characterized by slowly progressive neurological deterioration, in contrast to frequent relapses in MS. In Lépreux's syndrome, acute episodes are associated with non-neuronal immunohistopathology, with anti-aquaporin-4 antibodies playing a key role in disease pathogenesis. In syndromes associated with central pontine myelin lesions, non-inflammatory demyelinating lesions are also the underlying pathology. In the presence of severe and progressive disability, IVIg therapy should be considered and clinical trials for its efficacy in CPDD are warranted.Q: How do
